

Welcome to Iowa!

A post from Kelli-

So this is what happened on Sunday-

Are you wondering if that is snow? Well in that case you would be unfortunately wondering right.

I had to work all weekend and so by Sunday I was just a bit on the tired side of things. I was giving a patient their medication and turned around to the lovely...or not so lovely...sight of snow.

Needless to say, this year has been less than ideal for farming. The weather this year has made it even worse. Pretty much all of September and most of October it has rained..and rained...and rained. This has made it pretty impossible to get any field work done. While the snow didnt stick around, it was still another warning of aorts that it will be here sooner than the farmers would like it to be.

For a while there was discussion of not doing a fourth crop of hay because it rained so much, but as I write this, they are mowing hay out my window so I'm guessing that means that the plans have changes once again.

For me, I always joke that it is now the season of eating whatever I want for supper. Lots of times Jason either brings something with him or grabs stuff quick throughout the day because there just isn't the time to stop and eat a meal—and I think that this year will be even worse because they're getting down to crunch time.

But as the good book says—there is a time to plant and a time to reap what has been planted—it looks like it'll just be a bit later this year!
